

What is the Purpose of a Price Reduction?

Let me start with a football analogy. I find it fascinating that managing a game has gotten so complicated that coaches roam the sidelines with huge, laminated, color-coded charts telling them what to do in various situations. Many rely on “analytics” rather than having a feeling for the “ebb and flow” of the game. For example, after scoring a touchdown, should the team try a 2-point conversion or just kick the “extra-point”? Data drives many decisions in our daily lives and I think we rely too often on the past as if the future is guaranteed to repeat itself. Human beings are not machines!

Real Estate is at its core a “people business” which means we need to educate the public, be prepared to answer their questions and respond to their concerns. Too many of us make what we do a mystery which can cause our clients and customers to under-value what we do as well as make them frustrated when we do not explain ourselves. The “price reduction” or “adjustment” is a prime example of this. Sellers have the right to expect that we have some idea regarding the “market value” of their property although many sellers have conflicting needs as far as how to price their properties. When properties do not attract showings, interest or serious offers we have to be prepared to discuss how to change that.

Many Real Estate agents have a “mental” chart that they use when a house is NOT selling. While there may be a number of possible explanations for this, many have a “one-size fits all” answer: REDUCE THE PRICE! While circumstances may require a price “adjustment”, lowering the price is not a universal cure: it may accomplish nothing and it co$ts you (sellers) money. Once a property is marketed, regardless of the conversation about “market value”, many sellers internalize their initial asking price meaning that any reduction may be perceived as a loss of equity even if the price had no chance of working in the first place. I wonder how many agents tell a seller that their initial “asking price” is reasonable only to have to admit later that it was too high? That will not be a fun conversation and, frankly, may be the first indication of a relationship going in the wrong direction.

Let’s assume that a price reduction is the only or the best course of action to increase activity so that we can generate an offer. To be effective, any price reduction has to accomplish one of two things (doing both is even better). Otherwise, you may literally be wasting the seller’s time and money!

- Would the proposed lower asking price make your house more attractive to prospective buyers already looking within your local market and price-range? If there are other houses similar to yours, would a lower price motivate someone to want to see yours earlier in the “shopping stage” or make yours more appealing as compared to your competition? What is the next lower price in your market and what is your competition? A reduction should have a strategy!
- Would the new price “introduce” or “expose” your house to an entirely new group of prospective buyers who may not know your house is available for purchase? I refer to what I call price “bracketing”, meaning what price range are buyers using for their searches?

An agent and their seller-client need to know the local market (the “competition”): reducing the asking price co$ts REAL dollar$ which may impact a seller’s plans. A seller should discuss strategy with their agent and make an informed decision BEFORE giving up their hard-earned money.

Simply lowering the price, especially if the real issue is poor or ineffective marketing, may not change anything! If the marketing is ineffective (meaning that agents and buyers are not able to find your property in their “search results”), few, if any, may even know you lowered your “asking price”. Guess what happens next? An agent may suggest that the reduction was not sufficient and ask for more!

There is no time for inexperience, empty promises or false expectations!

HIRE WISELY: We are not “all the same”!
